Analysis

Positive sentiments came from the more favourable outlook in US-China trade negotiations, as well as expectations on a more dovish Fed. Foreign inflows were seen by the end of the month, and contributed to emerging market currencies' performance. On the other hand, US government shutdown and ongoing Brexit negotiations contributed to uncertainty affecting market sentiments in general. (source: Schroders)

Analysis

In the January meeting, the Fed signaled it will stick to its 'patient' approach towards interest rate guidance on slower growth expectation in 2019 and mild inflation environment. The Central Bank expects a slower consumer spending and business investment; while tension with China and weaker global economy will take toll to the US economy. (source: Schroders)

Analysis

In the beginning of the month, positive sentiments were mostly driven by expectation of the Fed rate cut, which led to weakening USD and thus better performing EM currencies assets. However, selling pressures occurred by the end of the Indonesia 3 month and pushed yield back, amidst low trading volume. Increased geopolitical risk, prospects of no-deal Brexit were among negative factors influencing the market. US Treasury yield moved sideways and remained at 2% area, while USD denominated Indonesian sovereign bond slightly strengthened, with 10-year INDON29 yield decreasing from 3.3% to 3.1%. Analysis

During the month, the 10-Year Treasury Note yield also hit below the 2-Year note, accelerating worries towards economic sustainability given the inverted yield. The FOMC meeting is due on September 2019, which will be the key date for the market in regards the Central Bank's view towards economic view going forward. (source: Schroders)
